MailSite Use Case:
Family

Anne and Bob are married with two young school-age children. Anne works at home and Bob is an executive with a small company. Like many families, they have busy lives and different work environments. They keep their family calendar with an online calendar service. They also want to share their own calendars with each other to cut down on time spent scheduling.

Anne uses Apple Calendar to manage her own calendar. She shares it as a subscription link so that Bob can see it.

Bob uses Outlook in the office and his company runs MailSite 11. His calendar is kept on the MailSite server, so Outlook, ExpressPro webmail and his phone all show the same appointments. In ExpressPro he publishes his calendar and sends Anne the link. Private appointments show only as busy. He also subscribes to the family calendar and to Anne's, which appear beside his own.

When he is at home or on the road, Bob uses ExpressPro in a web browser or the calendar on his phone. This gives him full access to his own calendar and read access to the family calendar and Anne's schedule.

As the children get older, the parents can add calendars for school events or soccer practice. That makes it simple for Bob or Anne to schedule time to attend.
